The problem with any book of movie history is the question of which movies to include and which to leave out. The authors acknowledge this, stating in the introduction "this book chooses its movies as an atlas of influence, a collection of landmarks, and the hope is that there will be at least one movie that readers will choose to watch for the first time. • Which seems odd, because there are many movies here (especially those covered in only one page) that don't give any explanation as to why they were deemed worthy of knocking other, more well-deserving films off the list. It is hard to believe anyone would approach an encyclopedia of landmark films and choose to leave out The French Connection, The Poseidon Adventure, Halloween, Raiders of the Lost Ark, Ghostbusters, Die Hard, Basic Instinct, Silence of the Lambs, Seven, and every James Bond movie ever made. It seems hard to believe that a book alleging to include influential films would give Star Wars only 182 words (about the length of this paragraph) in a 350-page book. There is little behind the scenes material here. Regarding Nosferatu, we are told simply that it was nearly destroyed following a lawsuit and that's it " just that sentence. This is not a book about moviemaking, it is an encyclopedia of movies that have been made. Each one includes a footnote called What Else to Watch which unfortunately includes not only movies that aren't clearly obvious why they are relevant to the movie being discussed, but also includes some movies so bad they should never be recommended at all. As an example of the former, the Star Wars entry says to also watch The Hidden Fortress but doesn't tell you WHY. (Film buffs, of course, will already know why.
